Authors many times use pseudonyms for anonymity purposes...this we all know and the authors know they will most likely, one day, be discovered. BUT why after a successful career with an established name, would an author choose to start using a new name?

Here are the top reasons I found in my search:

-They want to try out a different genre and don't want readers thinking that "so and so author" shouldn't be writing (or it can't be any good) a mystery because they write westerns.

-Some prolific writers take on pen names to get a new following, abandon a failed series, or so readers don't feel authors are cranking out books too fast.

-The authors want a new perspective; therefore the create a "new" identity for themselves. They may also feel their name doesn't fit the genre they are writing.

-Male authors may try to write exotic romance and feel a female gendered name will market the book better. Female authors may use a male gendered name to publish a science fiction novel for the same reason.

-The publisher demands it for a variety of reason.
